wholly the subject of dress, a subject the rames played between the Glants that is always fascinating to one-half of the world. Few stage stars can boast the wariety and richness of costume that the variety and richness of costume that Valeska Suratt displays in this production. The man who can describe such a bewildering array of dresses is seidom found wandering at large outside the defines of a department store. The gown that caused the most communication was it hox seat. that caused the most commendation was ronic costume in presenting the character of Guido Spinni, the composer, about whom all the women of the court world have gone mad. He has an excellent stage presence and a good voice. At the climax of the first act he and Miss Suratt display some histronic skill of a superior order rarely seen in comic opera. Miss Suratt possesses all of the accomplishments that one requires of a comic opera prima donna. She is a grageful singer and dancer, an unusually unlented actress, and has a comic sense of the man who took the conticact to furnish the humor of this opera according to American plans and specifications. Many others of the large company are deserving of mention, but art is long and space short. The entire play is most attractive and contains all the up-to-date devices that so to please the popular taste in musical comedy. It will be seen again tonight and tomorrow night, with Manager McCoy has completed arrangements to receive them by special wire and they will be read from the stage between acts. Today's performances will mark the close of the big anniversary week programme and on the morrow a bill teeming with variety of more than unusual merit will be provided. Tonight will bring to a close "The incubator Girls;" Berry and Berry, excentric instrumentalists. "Smilling Joe McGee," the "king of minstrelsy." Valeska Suratt is Nella, the Baroness Von Barnau, beloved of Guido Spinni, the composer, who is beloved of all the women from countess to barmaid. The diguity of a baroness does not fit Valeska Suratt is Nella, the Room of the vales of the buildess o

It is seldom in this section of the counmarvelous costumes she wears during the play, and in the second act when the play permits her to drep the baroness and to assume a mask of gaiety she is as pleasant a commedienne as ever hailed from the vicinity of Bird Center, Indiana.

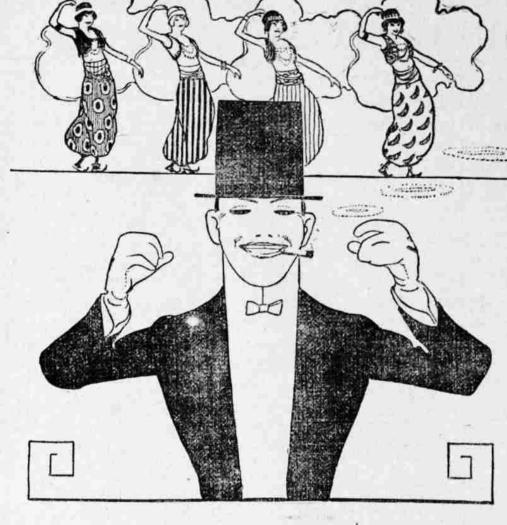

It would not do to dwell too much on the merits of the opera and neglect wholly the subject of dress, a subject of the games played between the Glants.

that caused the most commendation was one that swept into view like a comet at the beginning of the second and last net. It was a sort of silver fish-scale effect with red hollyhock ornaments and was barred with lines of crimson. In her hair the actress wore a gorgeous fisher colored plume.

To describe the divers songs and dances would be an equally difficult task. Here again the critic can select the most popular number. It was one that made the rentre first floor of the theater a stage. While the orchestra played a seductive march, the funnyman praneed of the holly curiffer troupe in all us splendor. Last, but most considerable, came Valeska Suratt, "clothed in white samite, but some ching more up to date and quite as wonderful."

This brilliant procession skipped jorously to the force and then stamped head for of boxes. Storne and played for one six of the stamped the company to repeat the performance several times.
